Choice Reviews Online

Welcome back
mm892@georgetown.edu.
Logout from My Password

49-2958 JC263 2009-51356 CIP
Social & Behavioral Sciences \ Political Science \ Political Theory
Marder's contribution to postmetaphysical thinking offers a set of studies of Carl Schmitt's ontology written for initiates fluent in the Schmittian vocabulary. Along the way, it also tackles a host of issues in contemporary Continental philosophy. On Marder's reading, Schmitt properly understood is no statist, antimodern or reactionary. Instead, an essentially Heideggerian Schmitt posits politics as a realm of becoming. Schmitt chides those who take the "state" to stand in for politics as such. In fact, Schmitt refuses the metonyms of "state," "law" or "Constitution," and instead reduces those modernist conceits to the event of the decision, the energetics of the contest from which form follows. If one mixes together Husserl's time-consciousness, Heidegger's temporal being as event, and Nietzsche's idea of a doing without a doer, and then stirs vigorously, one produces, according to Marder (philosophy, Univ. of the Basque Country, Spain), a reduction of Schmitt's main concepts into an existential ontology of "constitutive subjectivity" that is neither metaphysical nor totalizing. The sovereign subject creates itself in the doing, in the exercise of power. Where Marder's Schmitt then needs further explication is the constitutive role of history and temporality. Why reduce the decision to "constitutive subjectivity" and not constitutive intersubjectivity? Summing Up: Recommended. Upper-division undergraduate, graduate, and research collections. - G. D. Miller, University of Washington, Tacoma

More titles from Continuum International Publishers Group
More titles by Marder, Michael

Highlights of the ALA Annual Conference in Chicago are now available on Cognotes.
Important Announcement!

This site will no longer be updated. Click here for more information.